

RAVE: The parties continue underground

FROM PAGE 3

lante-parent types seeing this in the paper and saying, 'Raves, I know I saw that on TV, that's where they do that sadist-drug dancing.' Especially since there's no comparison between what goes on here and the Mainland."

Grim also runs Reality Entertainment, one of the four main rave production companies in Hawaii. The others are Double-O-Spot, Tech-9 Industries and Universoul Productions (spawned from the now-defunct Vedic Empire). Although they are all competing for the same limited crowd (limited in numbers, not by any means personality), each company's parties have a unique flavor.

Double-O-Spot productions, run by G-Spot (Greg Dehnert to his mother), is known for bringing in big-name DJs, such as Lars (of MTV's "The Real World") and Aphrodite from the United Kingdom. Despite the pricey $13-$20 cover, they have a regular turnout of 500-600 people.

Double-O-Spot has its fifth annual DJs Against AIDS show coming up, which in the past has raised thousands for the cause.

"Double-O gets a lot of the college crowd because of its format and his (G-Spot's) radio show," said Grim.

G-Spot runs the mike from 3 to 6 p.m. Wednesdays on KTHU 90.3 FM.

Grim attracts a younger, more eclectic crowd to his events. His parties are designed to have the mass appeal of the After Dark raves that saw crowds of

CORY LUM • The Honolulu Advertiser

Scratching — taking an old-fashioned vinyl record and making it into a whole new sound — is the very essence of what's going on in music's underground scene.

800-1,000 people, epic for Hawaii.

"All the parties attract the same people, salt-and-peppered with very specific crowds like hippies and Krishna kids," said Grim.

Vedic Empire ("vedic" is the Sanskrit term for "culture") tried to provide a "cross-cultural party experience, taking underground music and mixing it with ethnic drumming, dancing, visuals and food," said Tricky, one of the Vedic organizers along with Atmah Rama and Vrn.

"Vedic parties were very different, very spiritual," said Mike Garcia, 21.

Tricky and Atmah, along with the office of student activities at Kapiolani Community College, are now throwing parties as Universoul Productions. With the same vision as Vedic, Universoul is planning four not-for-profit parties at the KCC campus center — also known as the cafeteria.

These parties feature four sound systems playing the music that defines the underground dance scene.

The first is an underground hiphop room playing Method Man, DJ Shadow-type sounds. The second room is dedicated to a synthetic music called "trance," but focusing on what Tricky called "Goa trance," a hypnotic acoustic sound but with a fast bouncy beat (originating in India).

House, which is usually slower with more loops and samples than trance, will dominate the third room; and jungle, defined by its break-beat and use of drum and bass, will be played in the fourth room.

In this scene, the "artists" are DJs. Some of the big local DJs are Tricky, spinning house; Bumble Bee, spinning underground hiphop; and the Trinity Crew, which consists of Spex, Mase and 4est, spinning jungle.

"I got into the NYC rave scene at a young age and started spinning at 16," Tricky said. "I spin hard, thumpy house but what defines me is I can get into my own music. I'm right there with the people on the dance floor, only with two turntables in front of me."

Garcia prefers Tricky's raves, saying they're the best in Hawaii.

"I love DJs that will rock the crowd with personality — screaming, yelling, spinning around," he said. "Watching him is awesome."

The main limitation on any Hawaii underground scene is its size, thus potential revenue.

"I opened Formula 660 (660 Ala Moana Blvd.) when Euphoria (1046 Waimanu St.) was doing great," Garcia said. "I wanted a bigger place to fit more people but the scene wasn't big enough. We tried every format — ska nights, punk shows, a lounge called Cafe Sounds — but none of those paid the rent, so I decided to sell out and change to a Top 40 format. My heart belongs to the underground, but the kids want mainstream, booty music."

Tricky said, "The Hawaii scene has always been small and intricate, with only so many promoters. The problem is the promoters backstab each other. This happens in big scenes but because the scene is so small here, it works against it."

"The scene has deteriorated to its lowest point in the past couple of months," said Grim. "The crowd has diminished because everyone in Hawaii is so damn lazy. We put on quality productions, import real artists, but people don't feel like dressing up or driving 20 minutes. It takes an effort to be part of this scene and not enough people are doing it, even though the techno-house scene is getting mainstream exposure like MTV and Extreme Radio (104.7 FM)."

And as with underground scenes everywhere, drugs are prevalent, but here don't drive the scene.

"I've been drug-free for four years," said Tricky. "Today I get high with my music. Sometimes I need to be held up when I step off the turntables. House music is a tool to reach unmeasurable plateaus."

Candy raver rags are the be-seen choice

A rave party will advertise its featured DJs on its flier, but you have to actually attend a party to get a feel for the fashion.

"People want to stand out and look good, and with that comes a need for fashion statements," said DJ Tricky Trevor.

For the established crowd it's clear, but "candy ravers" (newcomers to the scene), truly there to be seen, are very different.

"They are really into the scene, at every party, cute in their club wear, being introduced to everything," said party-goer Mark Garcia.

They are easily spotted by their baggy pants, stuffed animal backpacks and flashy tops. The style was described by scenester Dave Gulick, 21, as "new-wave-retro-disco-era with a '90s twist."

In the tradition of Funk Pistol, the defunct clothing/skate store once taking up residence next to Jelly's, the latest styles can be found at Galaxy Funk. Located under Fusions Waikiki, Galaxy Funk opened a month ago with the intent of bringing New York, San Francisco and Los Angeles rave, upper-club and street wear to Hawaii.

"We cover all aspects of youth culture," said Dexter (Hideki Sherb, 21), the store's buyer. "... Rave kids are looking for unique clothing, wide-bottom pants, nylon, reflective, flashy, unique stuff with a lot of detailing like piping and glitter."

The store is ultra-trendy, with house music in constant rotation and the inner and outer walls covered with graffiti. The clothing is brand-conscious — and therefore pricey; for the raver with a little less in discretionary funds, it's old faves Goodwill and The Salvation Army.

— Lauren Uyetake

At Galaxy Funk, they've got the look for the underground scene — flash, sass and some downright other-worldly. Here's a peek at what made the runway at Galaxy Funk's recent fashion show.